The association between depression and parenting of adolescents in a rural, medically underserved population. Depression is one of the most prevalent mental health problems among adolescents. The primary objective of this study was to evaluate the association between depression, substance use and parenting practices in a rural, medically underserved population of adolescents. The secondary objective of this study was to assess the association between depression, substance use and the parent-child relationship. The research design used was a cross-sectional, correlational, comparative and multivariate design. A convenience sample of 87 adolescents was recruited from rural hospitals in the south-central United States. Patients completed: (a) the Depression, Anxiety and Stress Scale; (b) the Drug Abuse Screening Test; (c) a questionnaire that assessed a variety of parenting practices; and (d) a questionnaire that gathered demographic information. Students who were clinically depressed or had a positive DAST score were rated lower by parents on various parenting practices, including being more punitive, less supportive and negatively reinforcing, as well as having lower satisfaction in the parent-child relationship. Adolescents who used illicit substances, including marijuana, alcohol, cocaine and tranquilizers, were also rated lower on several parenting practices and the parent-child relationship. A large percentage of participants reported experiencing at least one traumatic event. On a descriptive level, adolescents with a history of trauma were also rated lower in the parent-child relationship. When trauma was controlled, the parent-child relationship and a history of depression remained significantly and negatively associated with a positive history of substance use. Depression is an important variable to consider in understanding parenting practices.
